All the preparations had been made for his execution in the week of April 29.

Warden Durston had gathered here a core of eminent medical men and expert electrical men. There was a hotel full of newspaper men here, and this quiet little city was in a perfect furor of excitement. Yet Kemmler, behind the great gray walls that shut out the sunlight from him forever, was indifferent. He whistled, sang, talked, and was happy. A reprieve came after Death's hand had been stretched over Kemmler's shoulder for nearly two days, yet the news had no effect on him.
